The Terminal List by Curtis Jackson
When it comes right down to it – who would you kill? Who and how many? Cliff Robinson is diagnosed with the gift of terminal cancer – a death sentence that frees him from the laws of society, as legal punishments no longer have meaning. Cliff now has time to exact revenge on those who have wronged him, those whose death is a betterment, those who have earned a place on The Terminal List.
About the Author: CURTIS JACKSON
By way of personal background, I am an accomplished Silicon Valley Technology Executive with 20 years experience, the last 15 in a senior executive capacity. I have an MBA from a top tier university and am an honours grad from the California University System, with degrees in management, marketing and finance. I have been on the senior executive staff of both public and private companies, taken companies public, sold a couple and buried one – basically a typical technology professional background.
Most of these years have been spent managing worldwide sales organizations. I have spent much of my career traveling, racking up over four million air miles along the way.
I live in the heart of the Silicon Valley with my lovely wife of 27 years, two boys who I encourage to choose a different career path than my own, and two dogs.
I have often been shocked, amazed and amused with how people mistreat people, how society is not really civilized and the most effective form of personal advancement is often targeted at the expense of those closest to you. Each reader will certainly know the people terminated in The Terminal List - although their names may be unique and personal to your experiences - but they have all the same sickness. In their own selfish minds, their personal insecurities justify the destruction of others quality of life.
An alter ego, Cliff Roberts found the courage in his own terminal death march, that most of us lack in life. The courage to hold people accountable, to strike back, cleverly and lethally and in an odd but real sense, make the world a better place.
